Join Leo and Javiera between 8 and 9 pm on Wednesday 09 March. If you are not yet sure about using Twitter you can follow the conversation here even if you do not have a Twitter account. You do need to make an account to respond to the tweets but it does only take a few minutes to do that.

Open Education

Leo Havemann and Javiera Atenas

This week #LTHEchat celebrates Open Education Week and considers how we can make openness easier to adopt. Open Education, comprising a series of practices and a variety of elements is almost a living entity, constantly changing, adapting and growing. Since Openness was first defined in the early 90's the term has broadened in scope so that the open family has grown into open access, open science, open software, open licensing, open policies, open data, open repositories, open publishing, open courses and of course, open educational resources, and open educational practices.

The International Council for Open and Distance Education (ICDE) describes open educational practices as those practices that support the production, use and reuse of high quality Open Educational Resources (OER) through institutional policies, promoting innovative teaching models, and respecting and empowering students as co-producers of their own learning. Open education is about making knowledge available to anyone.

Editor's Note

If you search for the hashtag #LTHEchat on twitter you will see that the last few hours have been dominated by so-called "tweet jackers" who have, like in past weeks, been propogating islamist propoganda and for the first time this week have been joined by dodgy marketeers offering to increase our reach on twitter(!). (Harldy a problem for this community I'd say.)

This is an unfortunate side effect of the success of our chats. We regularly trend in the UK and this attracts folks, to use our hashtag to give their messages reach. While easy to ignore in the rough and tumble of the chat itself, the editor of the Storify has to filter them out and it takes longer each week! Please let us know of any messages that we've missed.

Also, any suggestions for how to combat this gratefully received.

See you all next week for #LTHEchat 49.
