

BIROn - Birkbeck Institutional Research Online

Palko, Olena (2022) 'Poles of the World Unite': the transnational history of the 1929 World Congress of Poles abroad in the context of interwar Soviet-Polish rivalries. Nationalities Papers 50 (6), pp. 1143-1163. ISSN 0090-5992.

Downloaded from: <https://eprints.bbk.ac.uk/id/eprint/44129/>

Usage Guidelines:

Please refer to usage guidelines at <https://eprints.bbk.ac.uk/policies.html> contact lib-eprints@bbk.ac.uk.

or alternatively

‘Poles of the World Unite’: the transnational history of the 1929 World Congress of Poles abroad in the context of interwar Soviet-Polish rivalries

In the autumn of 1925, the leaders of various Polish civil society organisations working in the field of migration and diaspora (Polonia) suggested a novel idea for organising a general meeting of Polish minority representatives. An organising committee of the ‘Congress of Poles abroad’ was quickly set up with the task of ensuring that this future congress would help identify the cultural needs of Poles residing outside of Poland’s borders, and propose strategies for bringing them into closer alliance with the Polish government (Pamiętnik, 1930, 15-16). The idea of a congress received full support from the Polish authorities, with and invitations to join being signed by its Honorary committee members: Marszałek of the Polish Sejm Maciej Rataj and Marszałek the Senate Wojciech Trąmpczyński (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2935, ark.45-46). According to an information circular sent out to various Polish associations in other countries, the list of themes for discussion included problems facing Poles living abroad, their rights in their countries of residence, access to education in their mother tongue, and their cultural life abroad. The aim of establishing closer links among Poles throughout the world was also reflected in the Congress slogan – ‘Strength in Unity’ (W Jedności Siła). The flyer concluded with a greeting from the organisers: ‘The motherland (ojczyzna) will welcome you as a mother welcomes her children’ (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2246, ark.64-65).

The First Congress of Poles abroad took place on 14-21 July 1929, two years later than initially planned. In early June 1929, information about the upcoming congress appeared in the Soviet Polish-language press — Moscow-based newspaper Trybuna Radziecka (Soviet Tribune) and Ukraine’s Sierp (Sickle) —thus initiating the information campaign surrounding the elections for the Soviet delegation to the Congress. In less than a month, some fifty regional and city conferences all over Ukraine were held in order to select candidates for the all-Ukrainian conference scheduled for 2 July 1929. During this event five candidates, representing a total of 476,435 Poles were elected. Together with five approved delegates from Soviet Belarus and four from Russia, they were subsequently issued with passports and applied for visas to travel to Warsaw. Nonetheless, when the Congress opened on 14 July, none of the Soviet delegates were present. The Soviet delegation had been denied participation in the Congress of Poles abroad. The Lithuanian delegation was the only other national group absent from the Congress, since its representatives had not received exit visas.

What might this episode tell us about Soviet-Polish relations in the late 1920? How did these foreign considerations influence both countries domestic policies? Most importantly, what role did minorities come to play in the on-going Soviet-Polish rivalry? Based on a thorough analysis of primary sources collected in the archives in Kyiv and Warsaw, as well as other previously published sources, this article offers a transnational history of the 1929 Congress of Poles abroad, scrutinising Polish and Soviet perspectives on the event, as well as its perceived potential to mobilise their minority populations. While Polish planning for the Congress provides a necessary context (Wrzesiński, 1975, 1979; Albin, 1981; Lusinski, 1998), this article will primarily focus on the election of delegates from Soviet Ukraine and the prevention of their participation by the Polish authorities (Iwanow, 1991; Życki 2007; Ieremenko, 1993; Zarets'ka, 2006).

Interwar Polish-Soviet, as well as Polish-Ukrainian, relations have received considerable scholarly attention. In particular, two avenues of enquiry can be distinguished. The first deals with Soviet and Polish security policies, as well as anxieties about foreign threats and fears of subversion, with the Polish-Soviet borderland being at the centre of these scholarly investigations (Rieber, 2015; Shearer, 2018). Recent research has underlined how perceived Polish subversive and military threats contributed to the early Soviet state's decision to launch hard-line policies such as the industrialisation and collectivisation of agriculture (Davies, 1980; Stone, 2000; Samuelson, 2000; Whitewood, 2019; 2020), as well as more 'soft-line' measures that included the nationalities policy (Pauly, 2015). Moreover, Soviet security anxieties became one of the contributing factors in the authorities' decision to conduct mass arrests targeting the Union's Poles in the early 1930s, as part of the Stalinist terror (on the international factor in unleashing the purges, see: Naimark, 2010; Kuromiya, 2011; Khlevniuk, 1995).

Diplomatic history offers another perspective on the evolution of Polish-Soviet relations during this period (Ken, 1996; Kamiński and Zacharias, 1998; Ken and Rupasov, 2000, 2014; Materski, 2005; 2019; Bruski, 2010; Kantor and Wołos, 2011; Kornat, 2012a, 2012b). In this regard, scholars often focus their attention on the Riga Peace Treaty of 1921 and its ramifications for Polish-Soviet and Polish-Ukrainian relations (Ol'shanskii, 1974; Hisem, 2008; Het'manchuk, 2008; Pisuliński, 2004; Borzęcki, 2008; Dębski, 2013).

Instead, this article will explore Polish-Soviet and Ukrainian relations through the prism of minority experiences, thus contributing to existing scholarship on the respective governments' views on minorities, migration and diasporas abroad. While most scholarly enquiries emphasise how respective governments' minority policies contributed to an atmosphere of ethnic intolerance and resulted in ethnic-based violence across the region (especially in Volhynia: Piotrowski, 2000; Filar, 2003; Motyka, 2006; McBride, 2016; and Eastern Galicia: Motyl, 1985; Snyder, 1999; 2003), this article takes a step back to investigate what motivated those governments to promote such forms of identification in the first place; and how they utilised the national factor of mass mobilisation to achieve their far-reaching strategic goals (on Poland's migration policies, see: Wrzesiński, 1975, 1979; Lusinski, 1998; Kołodziej, 1999; Patek, 2000; Kraszewski, 2001. On the Soviet minorities policies towards Poles, see: Iwanow, 1991; Stroński, 1992; Kupczak, 1994; Brown, 2004).

The article's focus on the information campaign, and public discussion surrounding the election process to the 1929 Congress of Poles abroad, equally contributes to the debates on mass political culture in the interwar Soviet Union. Recent studies on popular participation and political culture during the Union's formative decades has emphasised the bilateral nature of the discussion (Getty, 1991; Siegelbaum and Sokolov, 2000; Lomb, 2018; Velikanova, 2018). The Soviet state took a deep interest in what people were saying. Within this process, Soviet citizens were not without agency and were able to negotiate with the state. While the available sources on public opinion among Soviet Poles can hardly prove the participatory and collaborative aspect of their relations with the state, the elections provided them with a forum through which to voice their disagreement with state policies and criticise state-sponsored modernisation. Moreover, the discussion of public opinion among the Soviet Polish population provides another angle to understanding the onset of the mass repression of ethnic minorities in the early 1930s (on 'The Polish Operation' of the 1930s, see: Rubl'ov, Repryntsev, 1995; Stroński, 1998; Kokin, Podkur, and Rubl'ov, 2011; Iwanow, 2014). At the height of the 'war scare', positive attitudes towards Poland and its government, and dissatisfaction with Soviet power, expressed and recorded during this public debate reinforced the party's security anxieties to the point that it contributed to the repression of the population based on their ethnic identification.

In this article, the 1929 Congress of Poles abroad is scrutinised on two different levels. At the macro level, it examines the Polish political and ideological context behind conceiving and organising the first general meeting of Polish minority representatives, set against Soviet responses to the Congress, through the intra-party debates and Soviet propaganda. On the micro level, the article goes beyond propaganda to explore public opinion among Soviet Poles regarding the Congress and Soviet power more generally. This two-level analysis also defines the article's two key objectives. First, by investigating the information and propaganda campaign surrounding the Congress, it seeks to elucidate a complex interplay between the foreign policy considerations, security concerns and minority policies of the Soviet and Polish governments. Second, it seeks to use party communications, intelligence and secret reports compiled during the local elections and conferences as a means of gauging Soviet Polish public opinion towards the regime in the early years of Stalin's First Five-Year plan.

This article argues that there was a reverse causality between Soviet-Polish relations: Soviet and Polish domestic policies and the Polish minority's public response. While the context of the Polish-Soviet rivalry informed the implementation of Soviet and Polish domestic policies, especially those targeting these countries' minorities and diaspora during the early 1920s, the latter had equal impact on public responses, shaping popular opinion towards Soviet power among the Polish population. As this paper intends to demonstrate, despite the party's considerable efforts to mobilise and modernise its minorities in the hope of drawing them closer to the state, many Poles in Soviet Ukraine, even at the end of the 1920s, expressed a persistent nonconformity with Soviet policies. Moreover, they continued to express fear of, and a lack of faith in the Soviet government. These negative attitudes towards the Soviet authorities among the Polish minority redefined Soviet domestic policy, paving the way for their eventual persecution. Consequently, this shift towards ethnic-based terror reinforced the inter-state rivalry between Moscow and Warsaw, resulting in greater distrust and antagonism.

'Class solidarity' vs. 'national unity': the origins of the Congress and the Soviet response

The initial idea to summon a congress of Poles from abroad emerged among activists affiliated to the Union for the Defence of the Western Borderlands (Związek Obrony Kresów Zachodnich, ZOKZ) in 1925. ZOKZ was looking for an institutional setting that would promote a link between all Poles living abroad and the Polish state without undermining their loyalty to their countries of residence (Wrzesiński, 1975, 298). In this, ZOKZ was inspired by a similar endeavour undertaken by its German counterpart, the 'Congress of Germans abroad' that took place in Berlin in the summer of 1925. The Polish authorities were also in favour of the idea, having grown increasingly alarmed by the political influence Weimar Germany was gaining in Europe through playing the minority card. Initiated by German minority organisations in the Baltic states, the First Congress of European Nationalities held in Geneva in October 1925, ran parallel to the League of Nations, and was instrumentalised by Germans as anti-Versailles propaganda (Wrzesiński, 1975, 299; Smith, Germane and Housden, 2019).

The Polish delegates to the Congress in Geneva discussed the possibility of holding a similar meeting of Polish minority representatives. Shortly thereafter, the leaders of three Polish civic associations, ZOKZ, the Polish Emigration Society (Polskie Towarzystwo Emigracyjne) and the Adam Mickiewicz Society for the Cultural Support for Poles Abroad (Towarzystwo Opieki Kulturalnej nad Polakami Zamieszkałymi Zagranicą im. Adama Mickiewicza), formed an organising committee to oversee the future Congress of Poles abroad. The committee also included representatives of the Polish government, in particular the Ministry of Foreign Affairs (MSZ), the Ministry of Religious Affairs and Public Education (MWRiOP) and the Emigration office of the Ministry of Labour and Social Care (MPiOS) (Albin, 1981).

The Congress was initially scheduled for 3 May 1927. An appeal to ‘All Poles beyond Poland’s borders’ was circulated worldwide, inviting Poles to take part in the up-coming event. The appeal highlighted the cultural and historic unity of the Polish people, disregarding their country of residence, as well as the diaspora’s historical responsibilities to the Polish nation and state. The declared objective of the Congress was to establish a permanent cultural connection between Poles living abroad and their homeland (kraj ojczysty) (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2935, ark.45-46). The invitation to the Congress was accompanied with a preliminary programme along with an explanation as to how quotas for each country would be calculated.

The number of delegates to the Congress was established on the basis of the estimated Polish population residing in different countries, with the largest delegations coming from the United States (32 delegates representing some three million of American Poles), Germany (24 delegates) and the Soviet Union (14 delegates representing the Poles of Soviet Ukraine, Belarus and Russia). Delegates were to be elected through independent associations of Poles (związek polaków) domicile in each country, the formation of which was based on free national and cultural self-identification, or for lack thereof, facilitated by the most relevant cultural and educational organisations. Altogether, 120 delegates were expected to arrive in Warsaw from 23 countries, including the Free City Gdansk (TsDAHO, F. 1, op 20, spr.2246, ark.66-67).

At this point, one could also ask why the organising committee even considered inviting Soviet delegates to Warsaw, allowing for potential disruption at the Congress. Mikołaj Iwanow suggests that, while the organisers could not simply ignore the large number of Poles residing within the Soviet Union’s borders, the invitation was itself an attempt to provoke the Communist Party into rejecting their participation and thus provide evidence of the Soviet regime’s repressive nature. To that end, Iwanow posits that the number of seats allocated for the Soviet delegation (14 in total) was intentionally limited to provoke anger from among Polish communists across the border. Moreover, the historian further highlights that it was perhaps the first time in Poland's history that the number of Poles beyond its eastern border had been intentionally underestimated: while calculating the quotas for national delegations, the Polish population in Soviet Ukraine was estimated to be 300,000, with a further 200,000 in Belarus and 150,000 in Russia (Iwanow, 1991, 260). By contrast, the Soviet census of 1926 recorded more than 780,000 Poles living across the Soviet Union (Vsesoiuznaia Perepis', 1928, XXIV-XXVII; on the problem of the Soviet census see: Palko forthcoming).

In early December 1926, the editorial boards of the Polish-language Soviet newspapers, Trybuna Radziecka in Moscow, Głos Młodzieży in Kyiv and Orka in Minsk, were contacted by the Warsaw-based organising committee about the upcoming Congress (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2246, ark.62-67). In early 1927, the same invitation was also sent to the Ukraine's largest Polish-language newspaper Sierp (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr. 2939, ark. 136-37; Sierp, June 4, 1929). The organisers encouraged the editors to publish the committee's appeal along with a dedicated article that would explain the significance of the event. The organisers also solicited exhibits for an expedition on the international Polish-language press that was intended to be held during the Congress (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2246, ark.62).

Information about the Congress was immediately passed on to the Communist Party of Bolsheviks of Ukraine (KP(b)U) Central Committee (TsK), that promptly called a session to discuss the possibility of participating in the Warsaw Congress. As the organisers in Warsaw had anticipated, the TsK meeting, held on 11 March 1927, decided that participation by Polish delegates from Soviet Ukraine was unadvisable (netselesoobrazno). Instead, a motion was put forward to organise an alternative congress of Poles in Soviet Ukraine, where the achievements of the Polish minority in the Soviet Union would be set against the failures of Polish government's own minority politics. However, this resolution on non-participation had to be confirmed by the TsK of the All-Union Communist Party of Bolsheviks (VKP(b)) (TsDAHO, F.1, op.12, spr.8, ark.79).

Around that time, information concerning the Congress had also reached the Polish Bureau (Pol'biuro), a special unit within the Department for Agitation, Propaganda and Press (APPO, Agitprop¹) of the TsK VKP(b), responsible for Poles living in Soviet territory. At a special session summoned to discuss the invitation to the Congress, a top-secret memorandum, to be sent to the TsK VKP(b), was prepared, outlining the Pol'biuro's position on the matter (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr. 2495, ark. 38-40). In the memo, signed by the Bureau's secretary

Sofia Dzerzhinskaia,² the Congress was condemned as an attempt by the Polish government to create “a nationalist and Catholic union of Poles outside Poland” that would be used “against the Revolution, the Komintern and, primarily, against the Soviet Union” (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr. 2495, ark. 38). The future Congress of Poles abroad was itself perceived as an instrument of Warsaw that was designed to influence public opinion in support of any future military campaigns. Poles living en mass in the Soviet-Polish borderlands were regarded as its main targets. By cultivating a sense of political allegiance towards the Polish government, the Congress, in the eyes of the Moscow-based Pol’biuro, aimed to create informal military outposts that would serve in a future Polish invasion of the USSR.

Nonetheless, the Pol’biuro were convinced that the Congress in Warsaw could not be ignored. According to them, participation by a Soviet delegation could equally yield great benefits for Moscow’s own strategic goals. First and foremost, it could potentially help the Soviet authorities develop the trust of their Polish population while also provided an international forum for Soviet propaganda (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr. 2495, ark. 38). Possible domestic gains, the memo continued, included tackling widespread anti-Soviet propaganda among Soviet Poles, strengthening their class consciousness and deepening their trust in Soviet power while encouraging them to contribute to the process of the construction of socialism (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr. 2495, ark. 39).

Internationally, the Congress might also provide one of very few legal opportunities to agitate in favour of the Soviet Union and its ideology abroad. Soviet participation could have important political and international resonance too—during the Congress, the Soviet delegation hoped to draw international attention to the negative treatment of national minorities in Poland and reject any potential support to Poland’s military plans. This might also have the added bonus of helping the Soviets gain the sympathy of Poland’s workers and peasants as well as improving the Union’s image abroad. Instead, rejecting participation could also be construed as evidence of the Soviet Union’s oppression of its Polish minority, leading to even stronger anti-Soviet attitudes, domestically as well as internationally.

Given the above, it was decided that the Soviet delegation would go to Warsaw to emphasise that their loyalty to the socialist cause was stronger than their connection to Poland. At the Congress they would reject the Congress slogan of ‘national unity’ in favour of Soviet slogan of ‘class solidarity’ (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr. 2495, ark. 39). In a way, it was a win-win situation for Soviet ideologists: either they would use the Congress as a forum to promote Soviet ideology, or, if denied entry, they would present the refusal as proof of the oppressive nature of the Polish ‘fascist’ regime, thus validating and reinforcing their anti-Polish propaganda narrative.

Consequently, Soviet delegation’s participation at the Congress of Poles abroad was deemed both important and necessary. To gain most from its campaign, the Pol’biuro encouraged a broad public discussion of the Congress’ aims and objectives at all levels. The election of the Congress delegates would receive widespread coverage in the local, republican and central press, both in Polish and other languages (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr. 2495, ark. 40). On 7 April 1927, the Pol’biuro recommendations were approved by the Politburo of the TsK VKP(b). Contrary to the TsK KP(b)U’s decision, the VKP(b) described Soviet participation at the Warsaw Congress as being ‘advisable’ (tselesoobraznyi). Responsibility for organising the campaign and form the delegation itself was thus assigned to the Secretariat of the TsK VKP(b) (Ken and Rupasov, 2000, 466-67).

The political dimension of the Congress of Poles abroad

Meanwhile, following the coup d’état of May 1926, Marshal Józef Piłsudski had overthrown the democratically elected government of President Stanisław Wojciechowski and Prime Minister Wincenty Witos and installed his own political movement of Sanation (Sanacja). As preparations for the Congress continued, so did the public debate around its ostensive objectives. Such debates exposed the lack of uniformity among the various communities of the Polish diaspora itself, especially in their assessment of the coup. Anti-Sanacja voices were particularly strong among representatives in the United States, France and Germany, those countries whose delegations to the Congress would also be the largest by a considerable margin. Moreover, Piłsudski’s supporters were still a minority within the MSZ, hence they could not rely on the Ministry’s compliance in organising the Congress (Wrzesiński, 1975, 300). In addition, the Congress’s proposed date of 3 May 1927 coincided with an election campaign in Poland, sparking fears that the Congress could be used as a forum for anti-government opposition during a politically sensitive time. The government therefore intended to postpone the Congress’s convocation for as long as it needed to gain enough influence and support to define the event’s ideological makeup and decisions (Wrzesiński, 1975, 299). However, it was the lack of unanimity among the Polish communities abroad during the delegate elections that was presented as the formal reason for its adjournment (Albin, 1981, 68-69).

Nevertheless, Polish civic and cultural organisations did not abandon the idea of the Congress. Following a broad public discussion of the importance of such a gathering, as well as the consolidation of the Sanacja regime as the dominant force in Polish politics, a new date was set for 14 July 1929. Unlike in 1927, the new organising committee fully reflected the dominant role of the state and Polish Catholic Church in defining the shape and course of the Congress. This new organising committee itself was established under the patronage of the President Ignacy Mościcki, Marszałek Piłsudski and Cardinal August Hlond. In addition, the committee consisted of numerous government representatives, including those from the ministries of foreign and internal affairs, religious affairs and education and labour and social care, as well as the mayors of Poland's largest cities: Warsaw, Cracow and Poznan (Pamiętnik, 1930, 20).

The 1929 Congress appeal was somewhat different to the one distributed two years prior. In 1927, the organisers had wished to reassure Poles living abroad that their home country had not forgotten its 'children' dispersed throughout the world and that it still remained responsible for them. By contrast, the 1929 petition highlighted the duty of the Poles abroad to contribute towards strengthening the Polish state. While the 1927 Congress was meant to emphasise the responsibilities of the state towards Poles worldwide (such as identifying their cultural needs or supporting education activities), the 1929 Congress accentuated the Polish diaspora's patriotic obligations in supporting the new state. The Congress was meant to show Poles abroad "how to be the spokesmen of the Republic of Poland and defenders of its interests in the most advantageous way for yourself and Poland" (quoted from Albin, 1981, 73).

This new emphasis reflected a more general shift in the government's emigration policy and their attitudes towards Polonia. The ideological scope of the Congress as conceived before 1926 had reflected the national doctrine of the National Democracy movement (Endecja), according to which the Polish state was seen as stemming from the Polish people and was hence obliged to extend its support also to those Poles residing beyond its borders (Wrzesiński, 1975, 297). The Sanacja regime was instead seeking to subordinate the interests of emigrant communities to those of the state, with the latter caring "for the economic and spiritual benefit of the immigrants while adjusting those to the benefit of the state", as stated in a memo from the MSZ (quoted from Wrzesiński, 1975, 300). Particular emphasis was placed on using Polish diaspora communities as conduits for improving Poland's international position (Lencznarowicz, 2019, 191). To achieve this, however, a centralised organisation of Poles residing abroad was needed with the Congress deemed a good opportunity to discuss what such an organisation might look like. As underscored by Piłsudski in his opening address to the Congress, the First Congress of Poles abroad saw the idea of “uniting all our compatriots in exile into one organised entity for the benefit of the Polish state” made manifest (Pamiętnik, 1930, 50).

In mid-April 1929, the official Polish press announced that the Congress of Poles abroad would take place on 14 July 1929, and that invitations were to finally be sent out. Unlike in 1927, however, no official invitation was received by the Soviet Union (Ken and Rupasov, 2000, 468). The Soviet Commissariat for Foreign Affairs did not show much interest in the event, unlike Agitprop and the Pol'burow, although they had received this information quite late and almost ‘by chance’ (Ken and Rupasov, 2000, 468). Towards the end of April, the Secretariat of the TsK VKP(b) decided to establish a commission headed by the Agitprop chief, Aleksander Krinitski. It is important to note, however, that there was no unified view on the Soviet participation at the Congress. Krinitski regarded the event as a great opportunity for anti-Polish propaganda both internally and internationally. Conversely, the leader of the Polish Communist Party (PPK) in Moscow, Leon Purman, and the head of the Special Department of the Joint State Political Directorate (OGPU), Ian Olski (Kulakovski), opposed the idea either for ideological or security concerns.

Krinitski himself was well-aware of the fact that the Polish Congress was ideologically hostile to the Soviet state. In a note addressed to the Politburo of the TsK VKP(b), dated from 29 May 1929, he recognised that the Congress had been summoned by the ‘fascists’ government and would make voicing opposition to the Piłsudskiites virtually impossible, unlike in 1927. Nevertheless, he believed that Soviet participation in the Congress was still ‘advisable’ (tselesoobraznyi) and could allow Moscow to pursue several objectives. First, the forum itself could be used to uncover the fascist nature of the Polish government. Second, the Soviet delegation could refute “the rumours of persecutions on national grounds” in the Soviet Union. Third, sanctioning the participation of Soviet Poles would undermine those Poles in the Soviet Union who “have not yet rejected the nationalist ideology and remain under the influence of the priests (księża)”. Finally, a state-sanctioned presence would prevent the participation of a delegation “hostile to us”. Instead, the Agitprop head proposed to elect the delegates under the close supervision of both the central and republican TsKs in such a way that 60 per cent would be the members of the Communist Party (Ken and Rupasov, 2000, 468).

In addition to Krinitski’s considerations, the decision to endorse the Soviet delegation’s participation was linked to the changing international political scene. It was believed that the formation of the second Labour government of Ramsay MacDonald in the United Kingdom on 5 June 1929, would lead to less Western support for Poland, granting the Soviet Union an upper hand in its ongoing rivalry. Consequently, the TsK VKP(b) granted its approval for Soviet participation. On 6 June 1929, a special TsK commission was established to supervise the election of delegates to the Warsaw Congress. Although headed by Krinitskii, as a compromise, Olski was also included as a the OGPU's representative (Ken and Rupasov, 2000, 468).

'Manifestation of Polish fascism': the information campaign

Once the official position towards the Congress had been defined, the Soviet information campaign commenced. Already on 3 June 1929, Trybuna Radziecka featured an editorial entitled 'The Manifestation of Polish fascism' (Manifestacja faszysmu polskiego). The same article appeared on the pages of the republican Polish press, Ukrainian Sierp being among them. The editorial's aims were two-fold. First, it provided an outlet for Soviet anti-Polish propaganda. The article went on to expose the 'true' intentions of the Polish 'fascist' regime that had invited Poles from abroad to the Congress to break the unity of the world revolutionary movement, establish fascist footholds worldwide and rally support for its government's anti-Soviet military campaign (Sierp, June 6, 1929; TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr. 2931, ark 9-14). Second, it sought to mobilise Poles across the Soviet Union, especially workers and poor and middle-class peasants, to take active part in the election of delegates to the Congress and, once in Warsaw, to voice their disapproval to the Poland's anti-Soviet agenda. The editorial illustrated this strategy:

Our delegates will go to Warsaw to tell the whole truth about the Soviet Union. They will speak about the ongoing grand socialist construction here, the socialist building that is firmly based on the conscious active participation of the broadest masses of workers and toiling peasants, including those of Polish origin, who had fought and won in October alongside other workers and peasants, and are now building a new life (Sierp, June 6, 1929; TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr. 2931, ark.12).

To challenge the Congress's intentions, the authors declared that Poles living in Ukraine, Belarus and Russia had only one 'socialist motherland' and they were ready to defend it from 'international and Polish imperialists' (Sierp, June 6, 1929; TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr. 2931, ark.12). Soviet Poles would go to Warsaw to reject the slogan of 'national unity' and instead call for international workers' solidarity and proletarian revolution. The editorial note published at the end of the article concluded with the following proclamations : “Long Live the Communist Party and the Soviet Union, the motherland of all toilers”; “Long Live the Union of Soviet republics—the only motherland of the working masses of the whole world”; “Long live a future proletarian Poland that would stride hand-in-hand with the Soviet proletariat”; and “Long live Komintern—the headquarters of the world revolution and its section—the Polish Communist Party” (Sierp, June 6, 1929; TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2931, ark. 17-18).

From 6 June onward, all the major newspapers in the Soviet Union, including the central state and party organ Pravda, had daily features dedicated to the elections of Congress delegates in Ukraine, Belarus and Russia. This coverage condemned Poland and its national policy, lauded Lenin’s nationality strategy and the Soviet minority regime, acknowledged the social and economic development of the Polish minority in the border republics and highlighted the leading role of the party as a purveyor of modernity among its Polish communities. Newspapers also published dedicated features on party activists, privileged rural workers, teachers and medics of Polish origin who condemned the intentions of the Warsaw Congress and highlighted their loyalty to the Soviet regime (e.g., Pravda, July 2, 1929). Needless to say, such voices represented the strata of Polish population that had benefited the most from Soviet power and its preferential minority regime.

The coverage produced by the central authorities did more than spread information, however. By outlining a list of concise themes, they focused popular debate and provided discussion materials for bottom-level election conferences. They also offered rhetorical tools on how to speak about the Warsaw Congress and communicate with the party. Most importantly, the Soviet press encouraged Poles to participate in the wider public discourse and express opinions for or against the party line. Meanwhile, party officials meticulously recorded their answers and opinions.

‘The Soviet Union is our only Motherland’: the election campaign

With the approval of the central party leadership, the republican Pol’biuro launched the election campaign. On 17 June 1929, an all-Ukrainian Public Committee was established tasked with organising and supervising the election of delegates to the all-Ukrainian Congress, scheduled for 2 July 1929. The Committee’s presidium consisted of the director of the Kharkiv Miedviediev factory named Buivan; the editor-in-chief of Sierp, Vyshnevsky; a worker at the Kharkiv Sierp i Molot factory, Shved; a worker at the Kharkiv Profintern factory, Smarchevsky; and the editor of the Polish Section of the Central Publishing House for the People of the Soviet Union, Sovinsky. The latter was appointed as the head of the Committee, later replaced by Buivan (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr. 2939, ark. 145;147-148).

Altogether, 150 delegates were to be elected to the congress in Kyiv during the first election stage. This calculation was based on the number of Poles residing in each province, with the largest delegations representing Volhynia, Kyiv, Shepetivka, Korosten and Kam'ianets okruhy (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2941, ark.28). Elections were organised at the provincial (okruh) (Volhynia, Shepetivka, Korosten, Berdychiv, Kyiv, Proskuriv, Kam'ianets, Vinnytsia); regional (raion) (Mohyliv, Uman, Kherson, Melitopol) and city (Kharkiv, Mykolaiv, Odesa, Kam'ianske) levels. In every okruh, a separate public committee was formed to supervise local elections and collect donations towards funding the travel expenses of the Ukrainian delegation to Warsaw.

The regulations received from the Warsaw organising committee stipulated that each delegate sent to the Congress should be elected through an independent association of Poles. In the Soviet context, however, these elections had great political importance and could not be simply entrusted to non-party organisations, let alone that there were actually none. Instead, control over the election process was in hands of the TsK KP(b)U. This body instructed that "in order to ensure appropriate political supervision of the election campaign, each election commission should consist of three members: a member of the party committee, a secretary of the Pol'biuro and a head of the OGPU" (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2932, ark.26). Detailed instructions on how to prepare, guide and shape public debates, gauge popular reactions among Poles towards Soviet power and, last but not least, how to select the 'appropriate' delegates were designed centrally and handed down to local organisers. As part of the process, party and state officials encouraged deliberation of Polish and Soviet politics among candidates. Overall, the election campaign was an opportunity to explore whether the Polish population, well-known for its hostile attitude towards the central authorities, had accepted the Soviet regime and whether party efforts to sovietise its minorities had been successful.

It is worth noting that delegates to the Congress were elected under the Soviet constitution and Soviet electoral law, according to which certain Poles were disfranchised. According to the data on the 1925/26 elections to village soviets, for instance, 0.7 per cent of Ukraine's Poles were denied the right to vote based on their social status. During the 1926/27 elections, the disfranchised comprised 3.7 per cent (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr. 2495, ark. 41-42; F.1, op. 20, spr. 2496, ark. 47) while in 1929 the number of Poles deprived of voting rights had grown to 3.8 per cent (TsDAVO, F.413, op.1, spr.452, ark.154). By applying this law, the party could ensure that the delegates to the Warsaw Congress would be elected by and among those deemed most trustworthy: workers and poor and middle peasants, thus minimising the influence of wealthier peasants (kulaks) and Catholic priests (księża) over the election process.

During the three-week election campaign, 37 raion conferences with a total of 1,100 participants were organised; in addition, a total of 1,219 participants attended 17 okruh and city conferences. At each meeting, a protocol reporting on the process of electing candidates was prepared. Such protocols followed a prescribed script throughout, although some were written in Polish and others in Ukrainian. These local meetings had a similar agenda: providing an overview of the international situation, introducing the aims of the First Five-Year plan, discussing the goals of the Warsaw Congress of Poles abroad, electing delegates, suggesting messages for the elected delegates to pass on to the Congress and gathering voluntary donations. At each conference, the ideology of ‘fascist Poland’ was rejected, while the party’s leading role was recognised. For example, the protocol of the committee meeting in Uman from 19 June 1929 read as follows:

We do not recognise fascist Poland where toiling masses and national minorities are being oppressed. The Soviet Union is our only motherland. Here, all power belongs to the working masses, and all national minorities, including Poles, enjoy equal rights. We wish that the proletariat in Poland achieve the same rights as we already enjoy here in the Soviet Union (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2931, ark. 16).

The protocol from the committee meeting in Hrudka from 16 June 1929 followed a similar line:

We would like to contrast the slogans from fascist Poland with those of fraternity among the proletariat from all countries and the poor and middle peasants regardless of nationality in their common fight against capitalism around the world (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2931, ark. 45).

Local organising committees were also expected to solicit private donations to fund the Soviet delegation’s participation at the Warsaw Congress. Indeed, during the election campaign more than 10,000 rubles were donated overall (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2940, ark. 49-50). The subscription lists feature numerous donations ranging from a mere 5 kopecks to 1 rubel (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2942). Very few attendees were eager to donate, however. As seen from the reports, prepared by the party officials sent to supervise the election process, local conference participants were reluctant to sign subscription lists or even have their name mentioned in the meeting report, fearing that their signatures might later be used against them. In Korosten, for instance, one party representative attempted to explain the low number of signatories by referring to an incident during the civil war, when those who had signed a petition against Soviet power were promptly executed (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2932, ark.2). Others feared that in case of war with Poland, their signatures would be deemed as proof of collaboration with the Soviet state.

Secret reports compiled during the election campaign also suggest that the Polish population was anticipating another war. In the village of Petrovka in Nyzhniosirohozky raion, for example, delegates to the local conference warned that “War is imminent. Poles will come and execute those who have signed” (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2931, ark.6) or that “There is no need to sign the protocol. Anyway, Soviet power is doomed, the war with Poland has started already, and those who sign will be in trouble” (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2931, ark.6). Conversely, participants used the rhetorical and political tools provided by these new public forums to influence the outcome of the election and negotiate with officials. In Korosten, north-west of Kyiv, one Pole had even pledged 15 rubles from each household in exchange for ‘their own’ candidates to be elected to the Congress (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2932, ark.2). While these reports were used to justify the lack of social activism among Ukraine’s Poles, they also exposed the discrepancy between the specific vision the party had for the campaign and its reception at the local level.

‘Let Poland take over Ukraine faster’: public opinion towards Soviet power

Newspaper articles written by the authorities created an image of all-out support for the Soviet state and its minority policies. However, secret reports detailing the course of these local discussions exposed a wide array of opinions that belied the propaganda slogans. Top-secret letters of explanation (dopovidna zapyska) sent by the okruh party committees to the TsK KP(b)U often reported on low attendance at conference meetings and a general lack of public interest in the elections. Limited social activism reflected the low level of political and civic education among the Polish minority while also suggesting poor preparatory work on the ground. This was linked to the low standard of party work in Polish village soviets. In the border provinces, the Soviet state was underrepresented, often having no party cells or party organisers at the local level. Those party activists who did work in these villages were accused of failing to reach out to a broader audience and not making party propaganda known to those communities without access to a Polish-language press. Weak party organisation at the local level resulted in granting the ‘broadest democracy’ to the masses (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2931, ark.5). Consequently, kulaks, priests and members of the Catholic church committees entered regional organising committees and were elected as delegates to the okruh and republican conferences (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2932, ark. 15).

The campaign involved collecting and accumulating popular comments. These opinions often contradicted the goals of the central leadership. One party investigator, who had been sent to perform agitational work and supervise the elections, observed a certain indifference towards public matters. Sceptics even questioned the fairness of the elections with one concluding that “They will choose their own candidates and will not listen to us” (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2932, ark.12); others doubted that their concerns would be taken seriously: “Why should we bother, no one will believe us anyway” (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2931, ark.4). The focus and concern of central officials, however, was about the loyalties of the Soviet Polish population. Public opinion, the reports suggested, was often in support of Poland.

As seen from the popular comments, political propaganda often resulted in the opposite of the intended effect. Extensive press coverage aimed to stir up fears of Polish subversiveness, instead kindled hope of swift political change among the Polish minority. Poles in the western provinces, whose livelihood was repeatedly threatened by adverse weather conditions and little assistance from the state, hoped for a better life under the Polish government. Comments ranged from those encouraging the election of pro-Polish sympathisers as delegates to the Warsaw Congress (“We need to choose good delegates, who will tell how we live here in the free Russia” [TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2931, ark.5]) to open calls for a military invasion (“Let Poland take over Ukraine faster, then we will have more potatoes” [TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2931, ark.4]; “Maybe Poland wants to take over Ukraine and this is the reason for calling the Congress? If Poland takes over Ukraine, life for us will become easier” [TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2931, ark.4]).

Pro-Polish sympathies, the reporters summarised, depended on the social origin of the participants. In the region of Markhlevsk, according to the report, “all working-class Poles were against the counter-revolutionary plans of the Warsaw Congress”. Similarly, poor peasants and most middle peasants had rejected the Polish ‘opieka’ (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2932, ark.10).

Richer peasants, instead, welcomed the Polish move, as presented by the comments from the village of Nikolaievka, Velykolepetyskiy raion: “I wish our own delegates went [to the Congress] and told them everything. Perhaps life here would become easier for us” (F.1, op.2, spr.2931, ark.5).

The reports also commented on the negative influence of local priests who were actively involved in the campaign. In some instances, priests urged their parishes to boycott the elections and other party initiatives linked to the Congress. In others, they encouraged people to exploit the elections for their own benefit. In one reported instance, a ksiqdz in Novohrad-Volynsky had emphasised that “mother Poland is calling her children to shelter under her wings, she has not forgotten us”, and encouraged his parishioners to take active part in the elections (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2932, ark.11). In Kytaihorod in Korosten region a local ksiqdz, a certain Bredytsky encouraged others to vote for ‘our own’ candidates who would tell ‘the truth’ about the Soviet Union. If this was not possible, he suggested writing letters to the organising committee in Warsaw, informing them about the conditions facing Poles in Ukraine and initiated a fund-raising campaign in support of such initiatives (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2932, ark.8-8zv.).

Top-secret reports highlighted how participants had taken advantage of the public discussion, and the state’s own language, to bring to their grievances and disagreements with government policies. A telling example comes from the Polish Markhlevsk Autonomous district, the first and only Polish national region in Soviet Ukraine established in 1925, some 120 km east of the Polish border. One S. Marchevsky, head of the Politbiuro of the Volhnnia okruh party committee, was appointed to supervise the elections in the okruh. He reported that peasants in Volhynia remained very much under the influence of the kurkuls and had little regard for the Soviet authorities. In the villages of Velyki Kosyri and Nerash of Pulyn raion, Marchevsky noted that, “kurkuli spread rumours that a man came from Warsaw to take all Poles to Poland” (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2932, ark.12). Marchevsky also referred to a complaint by a young middle peasant from the village of Hremiache (Korvyn village soviet) as exemplifying the attitudes of the Volhynia Poles towards the Soviet state, its policies and strategies of ethnic identification. He further observed that the villagers:

want to live as in old times. Without the cooperative system. [They say that] the newspapers lie. They all write about the achievements. And where are they? That they were tired of reading about the Five-Year plan, that the economy is not developing, that the party breeds disagreements in the village; that they give cheaper to the poor who drink and play cards. If Lenin were a good person, no one would have tried to assassinate him in [19]18; that a peasant is silent only because he fears the terror. That when he read Mickewicz and [Henryk] Sienkiewicz, he felt more like a Pole, than now when reading [Felix] Dzerzhinski and [Julian] Marchlewski' (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2932, ark.13).

The reports also exposed a deep distrust of the party and its activists, who even after a decade of Soviet rule were not regarded as, to use Stalin's expression, 'near and dear' to the local population. In the village of Nerash, the local residents were taken aback by the presence of a party representative, whom they regarded as an outsider: "Look! A representative was sent to us; but is he ours? Can you hear how he sings Communist (poet po-kommunisticheskomu)?" (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2932, ark.12). Another report showed that people were generally opposed to the communists and did not want to take part in any initiatives linked to the party. At one local village conference, the participants had even asked the head of Volhynia okruh Pol'buuro if he was a communist. Following his responding in the positive, the villagers retorted that "he has sold his Catholic religion for money" (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2931, ark.13).

These reports showed that public opinion among Poles at the local level was often contrary to that expected by the state with local interpretations of the Warsaw Congress and its aims often being in opposition to the official party line. While Soviet newspapers encouraged Poles to condemn the Polish Congress and express loyalty towards the Union, many welcomed it as a sign that the Polish government had not forgotten the Polish population across the eastern border and would come to ease their lot. While the party allowed and even encouraged popular participation, hoping to elicit public support, the public debate exposed the weakness of the party at the local level. Overall, a wide array of opinions expressed by the local Polish population, particularly those suggesting deeply rooted sympathies towards the Second Polish Republic and scepticism of Soviet achievements, amplified the pre-existing anxieties of the Moscow leadership over the perceived disloyalty of their minorities.

Pursuing 'destructive tasks and political goals': the rejection of the Soviet delegation

On 2 July 1929, 150 delegates from across Soviet Ukraine arrived in Kyiv for the all-Ukrainian Conference of Poles. During this second election stage, five candidates were to be elected to attend the Congress of Poles abroad in Warsaw. The meeting followed the prescribed script, with its programme being pre-approved by the TsK KP(b)U. Delegates acknowledged the success of the Soviet regime, especially the industrialisation and collectivisation campaigns, and the Moscow's nationalities and minority policies (Visti VUTsVK, July 5; July 6, 1929; Pravda, July 2, July 4, 1929). The conference participants also approved the text of a greeting telegram to be sent to the Head of Ukraine's Executive Committee Hryhori Petrovsky, in which the Polish population expressed full support to Soviet power and its policies (Visti VUTsVK, July 13, 1929). In addition to this, the delegates were called upon to vote for two open letters to their fellows in Poland. The first of these, composed by the Polish Soviet pioneers, was addressed to 'The children of the toiling masses in Poland', urging their comrades to help their parents and older siblings "in their revolutionary struggle against the fascist yoke" (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr.2940, ark. 38, 39). The second letter, 'To the toilers in Poland', invited Polish workers and peasants to come to Soviet Ukraine where they could witness the advances of Soviet minorities first-hand (Visti VUTsVK, July 6, 1929). The respective visit of the Polish delegation, composed of representatives of different national minorities residing in Poland, took place in August 1929 (Pravda, August 9, 1929; and Rupasov 2000, 470-71; 473-74). Poles from Soviet Ukraine also invited their counterparts from Soviet Belarus and Russia in order to participate in a socialist competition to rebuild Polish villages, that included a campaign to eradicate illiteracy in three years, full collectivisation and increased crop yields (Visti VUTsVK, July 5, 1929; Pravda, July 4, 1929).

During the all-Ukrainian Conference, five delegates from Ukraine were approved to travel to Warsaw. These were: Karolina Khimska, a peasant from Hrechany (Proskuriv okruh); Sierp's editor Konstantin Vyshnevsky; Roman Sheviatovsky, a worker from the First Berdychiv State Tannery; Karl Shymansky, the head of the village soviet from Shepetivka okruh; and Frantsishek Rakovsky, a worker from the Felix Kon porcelain factory in the Polish Markhlevsk region (Visti VUTsVK, 1929, 6 July). They subsequently received international passports and were instructed to apply for entry visas into Poland (TsDAHO, F.1, op. 20, spr. 2944; Visti VUTsVK, July 13, 1929).

On 2-3 July, a similar conference took place in Minsk where another five representatives were elected from among 114 delegates. On 3-4 July, a Congress of Poles of the RSFSR elected another four delegates. These arrived in Kyiv on 12 July 1929, where they formed a joint Soviet delegation to participate at the Congress in Warsaw. Two of Russia's delegates from Moscow, a worker named Ia. Lesnevski and a writer called B. Pshybyshovski became its chairman and secretary, respectively (Pravda, 1929, 11 July). Shortly after this, all fourteen delegates were approved by the Politburo TsK VKP(b) (Ken and Rupasov, 2000, 471-72).

The information campaign surrounding the election of the Soviet delegates was closely monitored by the Congress organisers in Warsaw, as well as Polish diplomats in the respective Soviet republics. As early as 17 June 1929, the Polish legation in Moscow prepared a report to the Polish Ministry of Foreign Affairs, signed by the Polish envoy Stanisław Patek. The report analysed the propaganda campaign surrounding the elections to the Warsaw Congress in the Soviet press. According to the communiqué, the party had consistently interfered in the process of electing the Soviet delegates (AAN, Ambasada RP w Moskwie, sygn.73, ark.2, ark.3; Dokumenty i materiały, 1967, 5: 393-397). Moreover, said delegates had been chosen from among party activists, who shared the Communist ideology and thus were hostile to the Polish Republic. Polish diplomats in Moscow also believed that the Soviet government was intending to use the Warsaw Congress as a legal forum to pursue its “destructive tasks and political goals” (AAN, Ambasada RP w Moskwie, sygn.73, ark.3). In addition to this, the report continued, participation by the Soviet delegation could strengthen local communist and radical left forces. This also posed the risk of exacerbating Poland’s own domestic tensions, since the Soviet delegation would bring money to fund these groups’ future activities. In summation, the participation of the Soviet delegation at the Congress of Poles abroad could be “destructive politically, [...] even more so, it could lead to general disturbance; and it could even impede the entire course of the Congress” (AAN, Ambasada RP w Moskwie, sygn.73, ark.3). The Moscow Consulate also suggested that the Organising Committee in Warsaw inform the Soviet organisers that the invitations for the Soviet delegates could not be sent. This would provide the Consulate with a formal reason to reject its members’ visa applications (AAN, Ambasada RP w Moskwie, sygn.73, ark.4).

The communication from the Polish legation in Moscow was received in Warsaw on 17 June, the same day that the all-Ukrainian public committee initiated Soviet Ukraine’s election campaign. On 28 June 1929, at the height of the election and propaganda campaigns in the Soviet republics, the Congress Organising Committee sent a letter to the All-Russian Public Committee in Moscow informing them about the decision to reject the Soviet delegation’s participation at the Congress of Poles abroad. The letter was signed by the chairman of the Organising Committee, Marszałek of the Senate Professor Julian Szymański and its general secretary Stefan Lernatowicz (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2931, ark.81-89; 130).

The letter explained that the decision to reject the Soviet delegation stemmed from the fact that the elections had been held in contravention of the Organising Committee's stipulations. The coverage in the Soviet press had proven that the delegates were not elected by the free choice of the Polish population or through independent associations of Poles within the country; the letter accused the party of control over elections and manipulation. Moreover, many Poles were not able to participate in the elections since they were disfranchised under Soviet law. In fact, the Consular Section of the Polish Legation in Moscow suggested that only 30 per cent of the Polish population could participate in the elections (AAN, F.510, sygn.95, ark.94). The Organising Committee therefore believed that the delegates approved to the Congress would not represent the Polish population of the Soviet Union. Instead, they would arrive at the Congress having been tasked to disrupt its work and publicly reject its approved aims. Given these circumstances, the organisers did not consider the participation of the Soviet delegation either possible, or necessary (AAN, MSZ, sygn.10294, ark.39-40; Polacy na Ukrainie, 106-107; TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2931, ark.130). The same letter was received by Ukraine's Organising Committee and the General Consul of the Polish Republic in Kharkiv (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2935, ark.39, 41-41zv.).

Warsaw's decision, nevertheless, initially remained confidential (Życki 2007, 111), and the Soviet organisers continued their preparation and information campaign regardless. The fact that the Soviet delegation would not be allowed to travel to Poland became widely known only after its members had already submitted their visa application to the Consular Section in Moscow on 9 July, more than ten days after Warsaw had informed Moscow of its decision. This official rejection galvanised the anti-Polish campaign in the Soviet press. Republican conferences of Polish delegates were now used as a means of showcasing the social and cultural achievements of the Soviet Union and its numerous minorities. They also provided Soviet ideologists with an opportunity to slander the Polish 'fascist' government that had rejected the Soviet delegation "out of fear to hear the truth about Soviet achievements" (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2940, ark.93). Polish organisers, Soviet officials continued, had disregarded the will of 98 per cent of the Soviet Polish population and instead sided with that 2 per cent who had not been eligible to vote (TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2931, ark.81-89; Pravda, July 11, 1929). The rejection of Soviet delegation's participation at the Congress in Warsaw was thus further proof of the event's true intention: to mobilise the Polish diaspora for a future war with the Soviet Union (Visti VUTsVK, July 13, 1929; Pravda, July 11, 1929; Komunist, July 5, 1929; TsDAHO, F.1, op.20, spr.2931, ark.81-89).

In addition, mass rallies took place on industrial sites and at state institutions across Soviet Ukraine where Polish workers expressed their outrage over Warsaw's decision. Meanwhile in Minsk, some 15,000 people marched through the streets towards the Polish consulate, where a note of protest was presented to the consul himself. Another rally in support of the Soviet delegates took place in Leningrad on 17 July (Iwanow 1991, 265).

The Communist Party also used their proxies in Poland to broadcast their protest to audiences across the border. At the beginning of July, 'The Committee demanding the acceptance of the Polish workers' and a peasants' delegation from the Soviet Union to the Congress of Poles abroad' was formed in the Polish Sejm. The committee was composed of PPK members and other Soviet sympathisers. It issued an appeal to the Polish Sejm objecting to the Organisation committee of the Warsaw Congress's decision, on the grounds that it was motivated, according to the text, by the desire of the Polish government to hide the truth about the achievements of the Soviet Poles, all while the toiling masses in Western Ukraine and Western Belarus, as well as Lithuanians and Jews, continue to be oppressed by Polish fascists. The appeal was signed by the leader of the Communist faction in Sejm; Konstanty Sypuła; the representative from the Ukrainian Peasants' and Workers' Socialist Union Sel-Rob, Kyryło Walnyćkyj; and a representative of the Belarusian Workers' and Peasants' Union, or Hramada, Ihnat Dwarczanin (Visti VUTsVK, July 11, 1929).

'The Miserable Bankruptcy of Polish fascism' – propaganda continues

The First Congress of Poles abroad commenced on 14 July 1929 with a celebratory Mass in the Holy Cross Church in Warsaw and a march to the Tomb of the Unknown Soldier. Afterwards, Marszałek of the Senate Szymański officially opened the Congress at the Sejm building. Overall, 98 delegates from eighteen countries and the Free City of Gdansk participated. Some seats remained unoccupied – a symbolic reminder of the Polish population in Lithuania and the Soviet Union that, albeit for different reasons, were not represented at the Congress (Pamiętnik, 1930, 44). The absence of delegates from Lithuania and the Soviet Union was used as an occasion for propaganda speeches, in which the speakers spared no effort in seeking to attack the respective governments for not allowing their Polish populations to freely exercise their cultural rights and join the Congress at Warsaw of their own free will.

In his opening address, Szymański linked the rejection of exit visas for Lithuania's Poles to Kaunas's raison d'etat, whereby the Lithuanian authorities feared that a few delegates representing a Polish population that had resided there for centuries could pose a threat to the entire country. Conversely, he continued, it had been the Congress's decision not to allow the Soviet representatives to attend. The organisers could not permit the event to be used as a forum for spreading Bolshevik slogans. Moreover, their participation in this 'family gathering' was not welcomed since, as the available sources had suggested, Soviet Poles did not view themselves as part of Poland, instead acknowledging the Soviet Union as their true motherland (Pamiętnik, 1930, 46).

In his closing remarks, Lernatowicz, on behalf of the Organising Committee, maintained that Poles in the Soviet Union were not able to act independently and freely develop their cultural rights (Pamiętnik, 1930, 87). A special resolution on the absence of the delegations from the Soviet Union, in which Moscow was condemned for its repressive policies and disregard of minority rights, was also voted upon:

To our compatriots, who for many years have been subjected to the barbaric persecutions in the prisons of the Solovetsky Islands and Siberia for defending their nationality, language and the faith of their fathers, who have been deprived of all the rights and opportunities to freely develop their culture, this Congress sends the deepest expressions of sympathy and wishes to reassure them that Poles from all over the world, as represented at this Congress, will never forget the plight of their brethren beyond the eastern border, hoping that nothing could rip from their hearts the most sacred sense of Polishness (Pamiętnik, 1930, 116).

At the same, the Soviet anti-Polish propaganda campaign continued apace. As the Pol'biuro's leaders had predicted back in 1927, the rejection of the Soviet delegation became a running feature, enabling the party to accelerate its anti-Polish campaign, albeit mainly for internal use. On the Congress's opening day, Soviet newspapers vehemently criticised its aims, as well as the Polish government more broadly. Since the Soviet delegation was not allowed to travel to Warsaw, the main content of its intended presentation appeared in the press. On 14 July, a long front-page editorial, entitled 'The Miserable Bankruptcy of Polish Fascism', appeared in Pravda. The article glossed over negative political developments in Poland since 1926 coup, while pointing out the deepening social and economic crisis in the country (Pravda, July 14, 1929). Instead, it detailed far-reaching social and economic developments in the Soviet Union and the role of minorities in the construction of socialism. The main points covered included the situation of Polish labourers in the Soviet Union; the achievements of the Polish Markhlevsk region; solutions to the land and peasant questions in regard to Soviet Poles; development of the village cooperative system; advances in women's rights issues; the development of Polish national culture, schooling, book-publishing and literature; and the international relations of the Soviet Union (Pravda, July 14, 1929). A few days later, on 19 July, another article appeared in Pravda, drawing an official line under the anti-Polish campaign. This was an appeal by the joint Soviet delegation of Poles entitled 'To our Polish workers and peasants in the Soviet Union, in Poland and around the world', that once again reiterated the jaded formulae about the rejection of the Soviet delegation, and Soviet Poles being ready to reject Polish fascist ideology and rally their forces to build a new socialist society (Pravda, July 19, 1929; Trybuna Radziecka, July 25, 1929).

Conclusion

When conceiving the idea for the First Congress of Polish representatives, its initiators had sought to ensure each and every Pole residing abroad that the newly re-emerged Polish state was committed to protecting their cultural and national rights, and ready to step in if those rights and freedoms were infringed. When the Congress finally opened its doors in 1929, its patrons representing the Republic's highest political offices, called for those delegates to bear responsibility for the state and its growth. Poles abroad were viewed as part of their homeland insofar as they were eager to share its government's policies and contribute to strengthening its position on the international stage. At the same time, Warsaw was prepared to abandon its ambitious plans for a world union of Poles if that endeavour did not guarantee the unquestionable support they were seeking.

Pledging allegiance to Poland, however, was not always compatible with ensuring loyalty to one's actual country of residence, as in the case of those governments that were in open or latent opposition to the Polish state. In the case of Lithuania, its government had severed all ties with Warsaw over Poland's incorporation of Vilnius/Wilno in 1922. In the Soviet case, it was the mutually exclusive state ideologies that made the representation of the sizable Polish population residing within the Union's borders impossible from the onset.

The Congress of Poles abroad also served to nourish Soviet anti-Polish propaganda. Numerous accounts in the Soviet press appeared to validate the Soviet minority policy and the party's claims of socialist victory. It was indeed the case that, by the early 1930s, the Polish national soviets, and especially the Polish Autonomous Region in Volhynia, could boast a better developed infrastructure; an increase in the number of hospital beds, schools, libraries and reading huts; and entertainment facilities, such as stationary and moving cinemas clubs and collective farmers' houses (budynok kolhospnyka). However, despite these social and economic achievements, Poles remained alienated from the Soviet regime and were among the least engaged minority groups within the state-building process. According to an inspection of the Union's national regions carried out in March 1931, the Polish national region lagged far behind other national districts and had the lowest rate of collectivisation – some 16 per cent, it only experienced a 1.8 per cent annual increase during the 1920s (TsDAVO, F.413, op.1, spr.552, ark.14). Similar shortcomings were recorded in January 1932 during the examination of Polish national village councils in three provinces: Iemilcheno, Novohrad-Volynskyi and Shepetivka. It was concluded that in those three regions, neither of the state campaigns (collectivisation, collection of grain and the mobilisation of funds) had been completed (TsDAVO, F.413, op.1, spr.552, ark.14).

In the eyes of the authorities, the reason for such a low level of engagement in state initiatives were two-fold. First, the negative impact of 'kurkul counter-revolutionary activities'; second, the insufficient development of party and mass-work among the Polish population (TsDAVO, F.413, op.1, spr.552, ark.14). One party official named Vyshnevsky, who conducted an inspection of the national districts, noted that he could not find any evidence that, among the various village councils, the Central Committee's decision to implement collectivisation had even been discussed with its with poor and middle Polish peasants (TsDAVO, F.413, op.1, spr.552, ark.14). He summarised that the national soviets had failed to become Soviet strongholds on the ground, mobilise the poorer peasantry and guide the process of collectivisation and mass work. He also highlighted the widespread and unabating influence of the kurkuls and Catholic priests over the Polish population, especially their threatening of poorer Poles with the return of Piłsudski, who was prepared to execute all those who had joined the collective farms (TsDAVO, F.413, op.1, spr.552, ark.15-16). Although only depicting the situation in one particular locality, these conclusions were likely to have been equally true for the entirety of Soviet Ukraine.

The discussion of the Warsaw Congress's aims and the election of delegates was intended to mobilise the entire Polish population of Soviet Ukraine. Instead, beneath the thin veneer of Soviet propaganda that presented Soviet Poles as loyal citizens, it exposed the stark divide between the ideal image of the Union's Polish minority as presented by the press, and those 'real' Polish peasants who continued with their lives while despising Soviet state power. Many Poles in Ukraine preferred to stay away from this discussion. If forced to participate, they typically expressed escapism or indifference towards state matters, prioritising their own personal safety over any form of political involvement. Overall, they expressed a fear of, and a lack of faith in, the Soviet government, with many continuing to orient themselves towards Poland.

The information and election campaign surrounding the Congress of Poles in Warsaw is a small episode in the interwar political rivalry between Poland and the Soviet Union, in which national minorities within the borders of each country were used as instruments to weaken the rival. Indeed, as suggested by the Pol'biuro's secret report from 1927, the rejection of the Soviet delegation provided Moscow with even more benefits than its actual participation. At the macro level, the Congress gave enough material to produce almost one article a day in every major official newspaper, allowing the Soviet press to publicise the successes of the state's minorities policies, the achievements of Poles of the Soviet Union and their comprehensive support for the construction of socialism. This was extremely important as it coincided with the launch of the first Five-Year plan, for which the party desperately required a loyal and committed workforce. Similarly, it provided the Soviet authorities with a great opportunity to present Poland in a negative light, as a country that not only oppressed and forcibly assimilate its national minorities, but cared little for almost 800,000 Poles living across its eastern border. This proved an important message during the 'war scare', both domestically and internationally.

When viewed at the micro level, the election of delegates to the Warsaw Congress granted the Soviet Poles a voice, pushing them to publicly articulate positions and opinions regarding Soviet power they had not expressed so vocally before. By encouraging Poles to speak up, the campaign reinforced the view of the Polish population as less loyal to the revolution. Public opinion gathered during the election campaign proved that Poles were unable to be re-educated in the Soviet spirit leading, eventually, to the shift in the way those minority groups were treated by the authorities. Scholars (Iwanow, 1991; Petrov and Roginskii, 1997; and Martin 1998) agree that Poles would come to represent the first case of Soviet-led ethnic cleansing, and would become one of the first 'enemy nations' identified within the Soviet Union, whereby their national identity, shaped by the authorities own policies in the 1920s, was used as excuse for repression and persecution.

Bibliography

- Borzęcki, Jerzy. 2008. The Soviet-Polish Peace of 1921 and the Creation of Interwar Europe, New Haven–London: Yale University Press.
- Brown, Kate. 2004. A Biography of No Place: Ethnic Borderland to Soviet Heartland (2004) Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press.
- Bruski, Jan Jacek. 2010. Między prometeizmem a Realpolitik. II Rzeczpospolita wobec Ukrainy Sowieckiej, 1921-1926. Krakow: Historia Iagellonica.
- Davies, Robert. 1980. The Socialist Offensive: The Collectivisation of Soviet Agriculture, 1929–30. Cambridge, Mass.: Harvard University Press.
- Dębski, Sławomir. (ed.) 2013. Zapomniany pokój. Traktat Ryski. Interpretacje i Kontrowersje 90 lat później. Warsaw: Centre for Polish-Russian Dialogue and Understanding.
- Dokumenty i materialy po istorii sovetsko-pol'skikh otnoshenii*. T.V Mai 1926-dekabr' 1932. 1967. Responsible editor I.A.Khrenov and T.Tsesliak. Moscow: Nauka
- Filar, Władysław. 2003. Wołyń 1939-1944: eksterminacja czy walki polsko-ukraińskie: studium historyczno-wojskowe zmagañ na Wołyniu w obronie polskości, wiary i godności ludzkiej. Toruń: Wydaw. Adam Marszałek.
- Getty, J. Arch. 1991. "State and Society Under Stalin: Constitutions and Elections in the 1930s." Slavic Review. 50 (1): 18-35.
- Het'manchuk, M. P. 2008. Mizh Moskvoiu ta Varshavoiu: Ukrain's'ke pyttannia u radians'ko-pol's'kykh vidnosynakh. Lviv: Vydavnytstvo Natsional'noho Universytetu "L'viv's'ka Politekhnikha".
- Hisem, Oleksandr. 2008. Dyplomatychni vidnosyny mizh Pol'shcheiu i USRR, 1921-1923 rr. Kyiv: Instytut Ukrain's'koi Arkheografii ta Dzhereloznavstva im. M.S.Hrushevskoho, NAN Ukrainy.
- Ieremenko T. I. 1993. 'Pro uchast' pol's'koho naselennia u Vsesvitniomu z'izdi poliakiiv 1921 r.' Mizhnarodni zv'iazky Ukrainy. 4: 113-122.
- Iwanow, Mikołao. 2014. Zapomniane ludobójstwo. Polacy wpaństwie Stalina. „Operacja polska” 1937–1938. Kraków: Znak Horyzont.
- Iwanow, Mikołaj. 1991. Pierwszy naród ukarany. Polacy w Związku Radzieckim 1921–1939. Warszawa: Agencja Omnipress.
- Kamiński, M. K. and M. J. Zacharias. 1998. Polityka zagraniczna Rzeczypospolitej Polskiej 1918–1939. Warsaw: Wydawnictwo LTW.
- Kantor, Iulia, and Mariusz Wołos. 2011. Treugol'nik Moskva-Varshava-Berlin. Ocherki istorii sovetsko-pol'skikh-germanskikh otnoshenii v 1918-1939 gg. Saint Petersburg: Ievropeiskii Dom.
- Ken, Oleg, and Aleksander. Rupasov. 2014. Zapadnoie Prigranichie. Politbiuro TsK VKP(b) I otnosheniia SSSR Is zapadnymi sosednimi gosudarstvami, 1928-1934 gg. Moscow: Algoritm., Palgrave Macmillan.

- Ken, Oleg. 1996. Collective Security or Isolation? Soviet Foreign Policy and Poland, 1930–1935, St. Petersburg: Ievropeiskii Dom.
- Khlevniuk, Oleg. 1995. “The Objectives of the Great Terror, 1937–1938,” in Soviet History, 1917–1953: Essays in Honor of R. W. Davies, ed. by J. Cooper, M. Perrie, and E. A. Rees. pp.83–104. New York: St. Martin’s Press.
- Kokin, S. A., R. Iu. Podkur R. Iu., and O. S. Rubl’ov (eds.). 2011. Sprava ‘Pol’s’koi Organizatsii Viis’kovoï v Ukraini. 1920–1938 rr.: Zbirnykh dokumentiv ta materialiv. Kyiv: Holovna redkolehiia naukovo-dokumental’noi serii knyh ‘Reabilitovani istorieiu’.
- Kołodziej, Edward. 1991. Dzieje Polonii w zarysie 1918–1939, Warsaw: Książka i Wiedza.
- Kornat, Marek (ed.). 2012. Ruch prometejski i walka o przebudowę Europy Wschodniej (1918–1940). Studia i szkice. Warsaw: Instytut Historii PAN.
- Kornat, Marek. 2012. Polityka zagraniczna Polski 1938–1939. Cztery decyzje Józefa Becka, Gdańsk: Muzeum II Wojny Światowej; Oskar
- Kraszewski, P. 2001. Polska i Polacy wobec diaspory do 1939 roku, in: Diaspora polska, ed. A. Walaszek, 512–528. Cracow: Wydaw. Literackie.
- Kupczak, Janusz M. 1994. Polacy na Ukrainie w latach 1921–1939. Wrocław : Wydawnictwo Uniwersytetu Wrocławskiego.
- Kuroyima, Hiroaki. 2011. “Stalin’s Great Terror and International Espionage”, The Journal of Slavic Military Studies. 24 (2): 238–252.
- Lencznarowicz, Jan. 2019. ‘Away from the Homeland: Emigration, Emigration Policy and the Policy towards the Polish Community Abroad during the time of the Second Polish Republic’, in Dyplomacja w Służbie Rzeczypospolitej 1918–1939 / Diplomacy in the Service of the Second Polish Republic 1918–1939, edited by Wojciech Materski, 2019. Warsaw: Ministerstwo Spraw Zagranicznych.
- Lomb, Samantha. 2018. Stalin’s Constitution: Soviet Participatory Politics and the Discussion of the 1936 Draft Constitution. New York, Routledge.
- Lusinski, Cesary. 1998. Rzeczpospolita a Polonia, 1922–1939: geneza i działalność Rady Organizacyjnej Polaków z Zagranicy i Światowego Związku Polaków z Zagranicy. Warsaw: Wydawn. Instytutu Historii PAN.
- Martin, Terry. 1998. ‘The origins of Soviet ethnic cleansing’. Journal of Modern History 70 (4): 813–861.
- Materski, Wojciech (ed.) 2019. Dyplomacja w Służbie Rzeczypospolitej 1918–1939 / Diplomacy in the Service of the Second Polish Republic 1918–1939. Warsaw: Ministerstwo Spraw Zagranicznych.
- Materski, Wojciech. 2005. Na widecie. II Rzeczpospolita wobec Sowietów 1918–1943. Warszawa: Instytut Studiów Politycznych PAN, Oficyna Wydawnicza RYTM.
- McBride, Jared. 2016. “Peasants into Perpetrators: The OUN-UPA and the Ethnic Cleansing of Volhynia, 1943–1944.” Slavic Review. 75 (3): 630–654.

- Motyka, Grzegorz. 2006. Ukraińska partyzantka 1942–1960. Działalność Organizacji Ukraińskich Nacjonalistów i Ukraińskiej Powstańczej Armii. Warsaw: Instytut Studiów Politycznych PAN: Oficyna Wydawnicza "Rytm".
- Motyl, Alexander. 1985. 'Ukrainian Nationalist Political Violence in Inter-War Poland, 1921-1939.' East European Quarterly. 19 (1): 45-55.
- Naimark, Norman M. 2010. Stalin's Genocides. Princeton: Princeton University Press.
- Ol'shanskii, P.N. 1974. Rizhskii dogovor i razvitie sovetsko-pol'skikh otnoshenii, 1921-1924. Moscow: Nauka.
- Pamiętnik 1-go zjazdu polaków z zagranicy*. 1930. Warszawa; Poznan; Krakow: Rada organizacyjna Polaków z Zagranicy
- Palko, Olena. Forthcoming. 'Constructing identities, ascribing nationalities: Polish minority in Ukraine during late imperial and early Soviet rule,' Euxeinos. Culture and Governance in the Black Sea Region. Special Issue: Revisiting Soviet modernity in the periphery.
- Patek, Artur. 2000. II Rzeczpospolita a Polacy za wschodnią granicą, In Państwo polskie wobec Polaków na Wschodzie. Poszukiwanie modelu polityki, ed. by T. Gąsowski, P. Kowal i A. Rzegocki. Cracow: Księg. Akademicka.
- Pauly, Matthew D. 2005. "Soviet Polonophobia and the Formulation of Nationalities Policy in the Ukrainian SSR, 1927-34," in Polish Encounters, Russian Identity, edited by David Ransel and Bozena Shallcross, 172-188. Bloomington, IN: Indiana University Press.
- Petrov, N. and A. Roginskii., A. (1997.) "'Pol'skaia operatsiia' NKVD 1937–1938 gg.," in Repressii protiv poliakov i pol'skikh gradan, ed. A. E. Gur'ianov. 22-39. Moscow: Zvenia.
- Piotrowski, Tadeusz. 2000. Genocide and Rescue in Wołyń: Recollections of the Ukrainian Nationalist Ethnic Cleansing Campaign against the Poles during World War II. Jefferson; London: McFarland & Company.
- Pisuliński, J. 2004. Nie tylko Petlura. Kwestia ukraińska w polskiej polityce zagranicznej w latach 1918–1923, Wrocław: Fundacja na Rzecz Nauki Polskiej, Wydawnictwo Uniwersytetu Wrocławskiego.
- Polacy na Ukrainie: zbiór dokumentów*. 1999. Cz. 1, Lata 1917-1939. T. 2., edited by Stanisław Stepień. Przemyśl : PWIN.
- Rieber, Alfred J. 2015. Stalin and the Struggle for Supremacy in Eurasia. Cambridge: Cambridge University Press.
- Rubl'ov O., and V. Repryntsev, V. 1995. "Repressii proty poliakov v Ukraini u 1930-ti roky." Z Arkhiviv VUChK-HPU-NKVD-KGB. 1/2 (2/3): 116-156.
- Samuelson, Lennart. 2000. Plans for Stalin's WarMachine: Tukhachevskii and Military-Economic Planning, 1925–1941. Basingstoke: Macmillan.
- Shearer, David. 2018. "Stalin at War, 1918–1953: Patterns of Violence and Foreign Threat." Jahrbücher für Geschichte Osteuropas 66 (2): 188–217
- Siegelbaum, Lewis and Sokolov, Andrei. 2000. Stalinism as a Way of Life: A Narrative in Documents. New Haven: Yale University Press.

- Smith David J., Marina Germane, and Martyn Housden. 2019. “‘Forgotten Europeans’: transnational minority activism in the age of European integration’, Nations and Nationalism, 25 (2): 523-543. doi.org/10.1111/nana.12401;
- Snyder, Timothy. 1999. “‘To Resolve the Ukrainian Problem Once and for All’: The Ethnic Cleansing of Ukrainians in Poland, 1943–1947.” Journal of Cold War Studies, 1 (2): 86-120.
- Snyder, Timothy. 2003. “The Causes of Ukrainian-Polish Ethnic Cleansing 1943.” Past & Present. 179: 197-234.
- Sontag, John P. 1975. “The Soviet War Scare of 1926-27’.” The Russian Review 34 (1): 66-77
- Stone, David. R. 2000. Hammer and Rifle: The Militarization of the Soviet Union, 1926–1933. Lawrence, KS: University Press of Kansas
- Stroński, Henryk. 1998. Represje stalinizmu wobec ludności polskiej na Ukrainie w latach 1929–1939. Warszawa: Stowarzyszenie "Wspólnota Polska".
- Stroński, Henryk. 1992. Zlet i padinnia. Pol's'kyi natsional'nyi raion v Ukraini u 20-30-i roky. Ternopil: [s.l.]
- Velikanova, Olga. 2018. Mass Political Culture under Stalinism. Popular Discussion of the Soviet Constitution of 1936. London, New York, Shanghai: Palgrave Macmillan.
- Vsesoiuznaia Perepis' Naselenia 1926 goda. Kratkie Svodki. Vyp. 4. Narodnost' i Rodnoi Iazyk Naselenia SSSR. (1928)*. Moscow: Izd. TsSU Soiuzaa SSR.
- Whitewood, Peter. 2019. “In the shadow of the war: Bolshevik perceptions of polish subversive and military threats to the Soviet Union, 1920–32.” Journal of Strategic Studies. <https://doi.org/10.1080/01402390.2019.1640120>
- Whitewood, Peter. 2020. “The International Situation: Fear of Invasion and Growing Authoritarianism.” in The Fate of the Bolshevik Revolution. Illiberal Liberation, 1917-1941, edited by Lara Douds, James R. Harris, and Peter Whitewood. 173-186. London: Bloomsbury, 2020.
- Wrzesiński, Wojciech. 1979. Polacy za granicą w polityce II Rzeczypospolitej (1918–1939), in: Problemy dziejów Polonii, ed. by M. M. Drozdowski. 19—54. Warsaw: PWN.
- Wrzesiński, Wojciech. 1975. ‘Polityka państwowa wobec Polaków za granicą w latach. 1918—1939,’ Przegląd Zachodni. 5/6: 293-312
- Zarets'ka, Tetiana. ‘Pol's'ke naselennia USRR u 1920-ti roky: perekhid do radians'koho sposobu zhyttia,’ Problemy istorii Ukrainy: fakty, sudzhennia, poshuky. 15: 73-84.
- Życki, Artur. 2007. ‘Polonia okresu międzywojennego w Związku Sowieckiego narzędziem antypolskiej propagandy. Eksperyment regionów autonomicznych,’ Studia Polonijne 28: 107-116.

Archival Sources:

- Tsentrāl'nyi Derzhavnyi Arkhiv Hromads'kykh Ob'iednan' Ukrainy (TsDAHO), Kyiv.
 F.1, op. 12 (Osobaia Papka), spr. 8. Protokol no 79.
 F. 1, op 20, spr. 2246.

F.1, op. 20, spr. 2932.
F.1, op. 20, spr. 2495.
F.1, op. 20, spr. 2496.
F.1, op. 20, spr. 2931.
F.1, op. 20, spr. 2932.
F.1, op. 20, spr. 2935.
F.1, op. 20, spr. 2939.
F.1, op. 20, spr. 2940.
F.1, op. 20, spr. 2941.
F.1, op. 20, spr. 2943.
F.1, op. 20, spr. 2944.
F.1, op.20, spr.2246.

Tsentral'nyi Derzhavnyi Arkhiv Vyshchikh Orhaniv Vlady (TsDAVO), Kyiv.

F.413. Tsentral'na komisiia natsional'nykh menshyn pry VUTsVK (TsKNM), Kharkiv.

F.413, op.1, spr.452

F.413, op.1, spr.552

Archiwum Akt Nowych, Warsaw

Ministerstwo Spraw Zagranicznych, sygn.10294.

Ambasada RP w Moskwie, sygn. 73; sygn.95

Newspapers:

Komunist, July 5, 1929.

Pravda, October 10, 1920

Pravda, July 2, 1929.

Pravda, July 4, 1929.

Pravda, July 11, 1929.

Pravda, July 14, 1929.

Pravda, July 19, 1929.

Pravda, August 9, 1929

Sierp, June 4, 1929.

Sierp, June 6, 1929.

Trybuna Radziecka, July 25, 1929

Visti VUTsVK, July 5, 1929.

Visti VUTsVK, July 6, 1929.

Visti VUTsVK, July 11, 1929.

Visti VUTsVK, July 13, 1929.

¹ In 1928-29, it was called the Department of Agitation, Propaganda and Press. Otherwise, it was known as the Department of Agitation and Propaganda of the TsK VKP(b)

² The names of Soviet Poles are spelled in the Russian/Ukrainian orthography, as it was the case in the Soviet identity documents. Similarly, Polish transliteration is used for the names of Ukrainians and Belarusians residing in Poland.